INVESTMENT COMMENTARY - BY LAURIE MARDIS

The fixed income markets stabilized somewhat during the first quarter as investors evaluated the government's fiscal and monetary stimulus plans in light of deteriorating economic indicators. U.S. Treasury yields rose and most fixed income risk sectors outperformed, giving investors hope that the darkest days will soon pass. However, money market investments continue to offer minimal yields reflecting both aggressive monetary policy and the significant flight to quality in the short term markets.

Volatility marked the quarter once again with both bond and equity prices falling dramatically through the beginning of March and then recovering substantially by quarter end. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index fell through the beginning of March as economic indexes continued to deteriorate, but turned up when Citigroup and Bank of America announced they were profitable during the first two months of the year. Uncharacteristically, the bond market mirrored the equity market on a smaller scale as the ten-year Treasury fell on investor concerns about rising Treasury supply but turned up when the Fed announced plans to buy large amounts of Treasuries in an effort to lower interest rates and spur housing-related activity. Treasury rates typically move in a range of roughly 1.00 percent in any given year, but the first quarter reflected an entire year's worth of volatility with the ten-year rate moving in a range of 0.84 percent.

Recent government intervention has given investors plenty to consider. Several new programs were enacted during the quarter to enhance market liquidity and address "toxic assets" in the system. The Treasury opened the Term Asset-Backed Securities Loan Facility (TALF) program in March to allow banks to use securities backed by auto loans, credit card receivables, and other consumer loans as collateral when borrowing from the Federal Reserve. The program is expected to improve liquidity for banks and boost lending activity. Announcement of the Treasury's Public/Private Investment Partnership (PPIP) underscored the Treasury's focus on moving distressed assets off bank balance sheets, but renewed skepticism that banks will be willing to sell these assets at the severely depressed prices expected. Unfortunately, Congressional inquiry into bonuses paid at post-bailout AIG has made investors nervous about the PPIP as they worry about the government's willingness to change the rules in the middle of the game. The pending collapse of the domestic auto industry may provide yet another twist to the story if the government writes new rules to bail out the companies instead of using existing bankruptcy law to restructure.

The ultimate goal of the various forms of intervention is to stimulate economic activity and rebuild flagging confidence. Although the inflationary impact of this stimulus may not be felt for a while, the sheer amount of Treasury issuance necessary to support this level of spending should eventually result in higher interest rates.

The portfolio has taken advantage of various government interventions to improve safety and boost yield. Investments in Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have improved in credit quality with the federal government placing them into conservatorship. There are signs that the first quarter may represent the worst of the economic crisis as consumer spending stabilized after dropping precipitously in 2008 and home sales advanced. However, this may not translate into higher money market yields until year end or later when the Federal Reserve must deal with the impact of enormous Treasury issuance. We continue to look for opportunities to add yield while focusing on our primary considerations of safety and liquidity. We are pleased to continue providing top-notch service in this difficult environment.

OVERVIEW - BY BRYANT SHERIFFProgram Overview

The difficult first quarter of 2009 is finally behind us, but the Recession and turbulent economy is still front page news every morning. Rates on liquid accounts have fallen throughout the first three months, which is not news to anyone, but comparing rates from all your depositories is prudent during these unprecedented times. It is hard not to place all your funds in the highest yielding account, but diversifying your funds is fiscally responsible and following your investment policy will help in this situation.
